Safety training and education

Safety education is key for any construction company, and your training protocols should be outlined in your organization's construction SMS. Trainings should include general safety practices, as well as job-specific safety procedures. Safety stand-downs, for example, are helpful trainings specific to certain topics. If there is an uptick in trips or falls onsite, the construction safety manager may conduct a standdown to review proper procedures and safety protocols with workers. This should include general safety practices, as well as job-specific safety procedures.

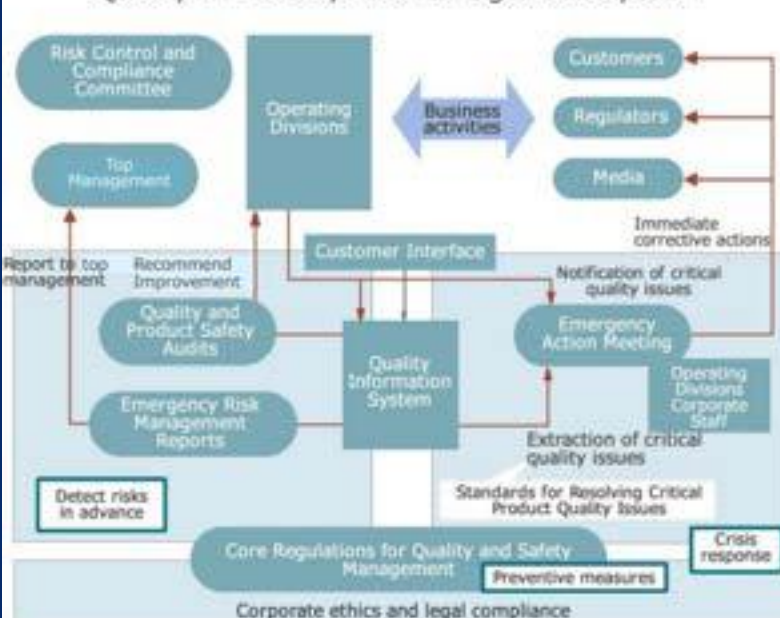

Goals of safety management

Having a comprehensive safety management plan is important for any construction company, no matter the size of the organization or the type of projects in the hopper. Below are five key benefits from creating a system that company personnel is familiar with.

Emergency response plan

Safety procedures should include an organization's emergency response plan in case of an emergency, natural disaster, or other situation that could put workers in danger. It's important that onsite personnel are aware of the evacuation processes, contact information for local emergency services, first aid procedures, and who is the safety person to facilitate emergency responses onsite.
